

'Oyster' by Michael Pedersen, with illustrations by Scott Hutchison

Review by Kevin MacNeil

This is the second poetry collection from Michael Pedersen, following 2013's deservedly well-received . Pedersen is well known as a co-founder of the Neu! Reekie! collective, which organizes nights of poetry, music and, if this collection is anything to go by, debauchery. Indeed, the poet's preoccupation with hedonism—sex, drugs and alcohol all feature—puts you in mind of the Beat poets. What really distinguishes this collection, though, is a combination of verbal ingenuity and, courtesy of Scott Hutchison, characterful and witty accompanying illustrations.

The best of the poems have a sensual lyricism that transcends both the Bohemian excesses and the apparent capriciousness. In Obsessive Cannibal Love Poem, for example, Pedersen writes:

The writing is clear, accessible and immediate – as befits on-stage performance, no doubt, but at times it suggests the simultaneous lightness of touch and depth of insight characteristic of, say, Norman MacCaig or Simon Armitage.

Pedersen muses over playful questions as well as large emotions. In Starry-Eyed he asks can a bell ring underwater? ; in the title poem he wonders How does tongue taste to oyster? before concluding Best not to know.

The lively humour present in the words and images contributes greatly to the book's winning charisma, and helps to over-ride the occasional lapse into outdated Kerouac-esque bluster or potential self-mythologising (as in Invitation to Luncheon with Caddy D and Manchester John: Episode II ).

The most successful poems tend towards dynamism, through their sheer verbal energy and their restless subject matter:

Pedersen's imagery is often a startling delight. I m a PC begins with an arresting image: Reilly's chest puffs out like/a pair of bibles. Elsewhere the poet combines the ordinary and the extraordinary to appreciable effect:

The fine, daft, clever poem Transmorphosizing describes how a carpenter turns into a chest of drawers:

This is typical Pedersen to take an unlikely image and escalate it from a point of potential whimsy (the carpenter is called Chester Drawers) to a deeper, more affecting place altogether.

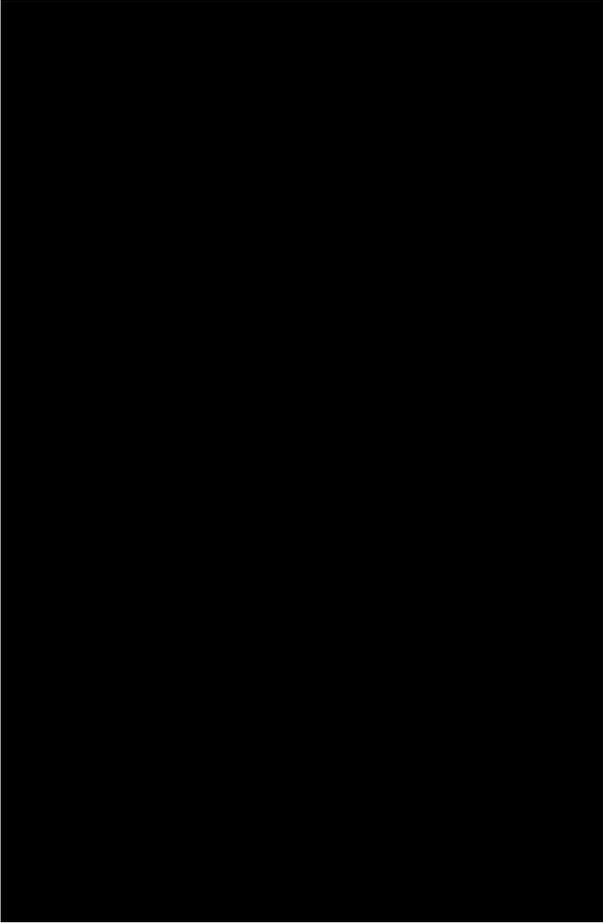

When Pedersen receives a text from his girlfriend (herself a terrific poet) concerning Humping Cows, he composes a poem that begins Dear Hollie/Let them hump before seeing in his support for their freedom to, er, love a spirited free-thinking move/towards righteousness, beatitude/tender songs. But I'm no fur fooling/nae one, I'm love-struck and horny. It's the love-struck rather than the horny Pedersen that writes the best poems, the ones that are filled with a life-affirming wonder.

It is also this mature, more socially motivated Pedersen that approaches the subject of racism in Conversation Overheard in Craigmillar Dental Practice, a powerful and indeed unshakeable poem. The conversation, whether transcribed or invented (and I'd guess the former), is horribly plausible: They'd huv you think you were sending them off to the electric chair rather than back to their ain fuckin country; Now I was thinking, eh and hopefully you agree wi me I'd rather be robbed off a Scot than yin o' them any day. Here Pedersen confronts unpleasant attitudes with a detachment, a lack of commentary that results in a

The poetry scene in Scotland has undergone some fascinating changes in recent years. Many Scottish poets of previous generations – such as Edwin Morgan and Iain Crichton Smith – were more comfortable, I think it's fair to say, writing for the page than performing on the stage. Yet the contemporary writer is often expected to have a triple-layered presence: on the page, on the stage and online. The ebook version of Obsessive Cannibal Love Poem is supplemented with audio recordings of the poet reading eleven of the pieces in the collection. While there are undeniably poets whose performance and/or social media skills surpass their literary merit, perhaps the future lies with poets like Pedersen who excel at all three.

The poem Oyster features a line that could equally apply to this vivid and spirited book: oyster has many magics .

Obsessive Cannibal Love Poem by Michael Pederson, illustrated by Scott Hutchison, is published by Polygon, 2017. This is the second poetry collection from Michael Pedersen, following 2013's deservedly well-received Obsessive Cannibal Love Poem. Pedersen is well known as a co-founder of the Neu! Reekie! collective, which organizes nights of poetry, music and, if this collection is anything to go by, debauchery. Indeed, the poet's preoccupation with hedonism – sex, drugs and alcohol all feature – puts you in mind of the Beat poets. What really distinguishes this collection, though, is a combination of verbal ingenuity and, courtesy of Scott Hutchison, characterful and witty accompanying illustrations.

The best of the poems have a sensual lyricism that transcends both the Bohemian excesses and the apparent capriciousness. In Obsessive Cannibal Love Poem, for example, Pedersen writes:

The writing is clear, accessible and immediate – as befits on-stage performance, no doubt, but at times it suggests the simultaneous lightness of touch and depth of insight characteristic of, say, Norman MacCaig or Simon Armitage.

Pedersen muses over playful questions as well as large emotions. In Starry-Eyed he asks ‘can a bell ring underwater?’; in the title poem he wonders ‘How does tongue taste to oyster?’ before concluding ‘Best not to know.’

The lively humour present in the words and images contributes greatly to the book’s winning charisma, and helps to over-ride the occasional lapse into

The fine, daft, clever poem Transmorphosizing describes how a carpenter turns into a chest of drawers:

This is typical Pedersen to take an unlikely image and escalate it from a point of potential whimsy (the carpenter is called Chester Drawers) to a deeper, more affecting place altogether.

When Pedersen receives a text from his girlfriend (herself a terrific poet) concerning Humping Cows, he composes a poem that begins Dear Hollie/Let them hump before seeing in his support for their freedom to, er, love a spirited free-thinking move/towards righteousness, beatitude/tender songs. But I m no fur fooling/nae one, I m love-struck and horny. It s the love-struck rather than the horny Pedersen that writes the best poems, the ones that are filled with a life-affirming wonder.

It is also this mature, more socially motivated Pedersen that approaches the subject of racism in Conversation Overheard in Craigmillar Dental Practice, a powerful and indeed unshakeable poem. The conversation, whether transcribed or invented (and I d guess the former), is horribly plausible: They d huv you think you were sending them off to the electric chair rather than back to their ain fuckin country ; Now I was thinking, eh and hopefully you agree wi me I d rather be robbed off a Scot than yin o them any day. Here Pedersen confronts unpleasant attitudes with a detachment, a lack of commentary that results in a poem that is more, not less, disarming and effective; he allows the racism to present its own ugliness, with no overt additional judgement needed.

Scott Hutchison's illustrations deserve a special mention. They are by turns imaginative, amusing, sensual and provocative and thus they provide a perfect visual accompaniment to the poems. Hutchison is best known as a musician, but it is no surprise to learn that he studied illustration at the Glasgow School of Art. On the evidence of his work in _____, it is very much to be hoped that he will provide artwork for more books in the future.

The poetry scene in Scotland has undergone some fascinating changes in recent years. Many Scottish poets of previous generations such as Edwin Morgan and