

The Islands Are Not Lost, The Compass Is

By Kevin MacNeil/ Caoimhin MacNèill

Recently, in my home island of Lewis I spent some life-enhancing time with two writers who were doing novel-related research in the Hebrides, one a Booker Prize winner at the dizzying apex of his career, the other, an American writer earnestly researching her first novel, demonstrating her commitment by starting to learn Gaelic. I am impatient already, hungrily looking forward to both books. During a conversation about how life is changing on these islands, Douglas Stuart, whose debut Shuggie Bain<sup>1</sup> won the Booker and hearts and minds globally, recommended I read The Colony<sup>2</sup> by Irish novelist Audrey Magee. I can see why. As the Financial Times describes it, this terrific book tells ‘a story about language and identity, about art, oppression, freedom and colonialism ... a novel about big, important things.’<sup>3</sup> These timely themes are every bit as pertinent to the Scottish islands as to the Irish.

I contend that a small island is a dramatic crucible, that cultural appreciation and cultural appropriation are nuanced areas, that awareness, intention, and identity form a complicated nexus. In The Colony, an English artist, Mr Lloyd, visits an unnamed Irish island to paint, promising to accede to the islanders’ wishes not to paint them, a promise he swiftly and repeatedly breaks. Meanwhile JP Masson, a French linguist (with an Algerian mother) arrives to continue his studies into Irish, a language he wishes everyone to speak, a language in which the Englishman has no interest. The flowing, stylistically exquisite past-tense chapters that offer the primary narrative are interspersed with sparse, present tense reports on sectarian killings (‘documentary interludes’, the New York Times called them) which are all the more potent for being so resonantly understated. The Colony is at once the most relevant and the most admirable novel I have read all year:

What do you think, Micheál? said Masson. Are you less Irish when you speak English?

I don't talk politics, Masson. You know that.

We're talking about language, Micheál.

Same thing.<sup>4</sup>

The last few years have been turbulent, not just in the Celtic lands, but everywhere. Assailed by a daily tsunami of (frequently unbidden) information, besieged in a world of attention-span decimating TikToks, negotiating a headspace that must now attempt to separate human authenticity from queasy AI fakery and plagiarism, many people struggle to make time for engaged reading. The novel itself, I fear, is being devalued in ways that are both active and passive, blatant and insidious. This does all of us a disservice, and by 'all of us' I am including people not yet born, for good literature transcends, even as it elucidates, time.

It was an enriching visit home, giving me the chance to privately as well as publicly honour and explore the achievements of Douglas Stuart, and to enthuse over and discuss the future novel of Jane Ainslie, the American writer. Past, present, future, emic, etic,<sup>5</sup> fictional, actual - all these elements came thrillingly alive in harmonious dialogue, as dedicated authors shared vital truths.

I really believe in fiction. On Monday, 15 May 2017, I found myself sitting on a seat thirty-five thousand feet up in the air, barrelling through the sky on a flight to Buenos Aires, overworked and grateful for the opportunity to travel to a new country. I had never been there, yet Argentina was not really new to me, for a specific form of mind-to-mind transmission, reading, had established an Argentina within me already. In particular, the works of Jorge Luis Borges had created in my mind a complex and captivating land, one that simultaneously owed much to global literature, Borges being surely one of the most well-read writers of his or any other day. He had a great love of Scottish literature and proclaimed frequently that he considered Robert Louis Stevenson a personal friend, no matter that Stevenson died before Borges was born. One of the sincere marvels of literature, then, is that it proves friendship, travel, and time alike exist in ways that outshine their mundane definitions; literature bestows upon the engaged reader further dimensions.

I was flying over a pre-pandemic world to Argentina to explore the capital city Buenos Aires and a mountain in Capilla del Monte, Cerro Uritorco, about which I had heard some strange and compelling things. Great busyness meant I was apparently unprepared, for I was reading two books on the plane that I ought to have read and absorbed before then. One was a book of short stories, Things We Lost in the Fire, by Mariana Enriquez, and the other was a guidebook to Argentina. These books were quite different - ostensibly, one was fiction and the other factual. Even their covers were polar opposites, with one being dark and Gothic, while the other was white and clinical. I was going to be spending time with Mariana Enriquez as part of the Outriders initiative,<sup>6</sup> a project that inherently demonstrates the value of both emic and etic perspectives. I would be living for a few weeks in a country that was theoretically unfamiliar to me. By the time the plane touched down in a country whose sky resembled its own flag, as Scotland's sometimes does, I had gained a broad and solid insight into Argentina - her culture, her outlook, her modus vivendi. But I had gleaned these understandings from the work of fiction. The non-fiction book, the guidebook, by contrast offered a heavily sanitised, even idealised, version of Argentina, replete with glossy photographs and adjectives that performed the verbal equivalent of airbrushing. Between Borges and Enriquez, I had a fair grasp of where I would be spending the next few weeks. This I took as further proof of my belief that - to amend something Picasso said about visual art - 'Fictions are lies that reveal bigger truths'.

Writers are often fortunate enough to be invited to visit other countries, to experience other cultures, to share words, hopes, ideas. Some writing residencies stipulate that the author write something specifically in response to the place where they are staying. In other words, I wish to make it clear that etic impressions, opinions, and understandings about a place are nothing less than vital. Emic perspectives deserve equal prominence, since the place, its culture, and its language(s) are organically embedded in the way indigenous writers think. Emic and etic perspectives work best when they are in dialogue, i.e. when both are given fair space to express themselves, in which case they balance and strengthen each other.

Fiction enhances life-as-lived. One islander who seldom felt the need to escape his steadfast rock is George Mackay Brown. The first time I visited Orkney I was thrilled to note that the ferry I took to Stromness made allusions to his work; quotations from his poems and stories brightened - deepened would be a better word - the décor. When I disembarked and set foot on this island that I had visited so many times in George Mackay Brown's writing, I felt as though I were walking through one GMB poem and story after another. It was a giddy, entrancing experience, like meeting a relative who died before you were born and finding them to be every bit as enticing as you had hoped. 'Books permit us to voyage through time,' said Carl Sagan.<sup>7</sup> It is true. The first-time visitor to a place benefits mightily from a palimpsest view if they have the good fortune to be a dedicated reader. Mind you, it will naturally depend on what they have been reading, how nutritious and edifying the mental nourishment. A guidebook might list the ingredients, a worthwhile novel will provide the taste.

This emphasises how crucial it is that the curators of our cultural heritage pay close attention to emic and etic perspectives, both. Vicarious experience is a phrase that most people interpret with stress on the first word, but I wish to highlight the fact that vicarious experience is also still a form of experience. Neuroscientists are demonstrating, to no reader's or writer's surprise, that 'reading action-related words also prompts our bodies to physically mimic the actions we are reading about'.<sup>8</sup> Authors sometimes talk about 'method writing' (imaginatively embodying the experience being described while setting the words down) and readers will often report being truly engrossed in a narrative as if it is really happening, the result of immersive, evocative authorial skills and attentive reading. All of which implies that literature and literary tourism could play a more genuinely meaningful role in how we portray our cultural identity to others and to ourselves.

The literature that lasts offers us insight - this is partly why it endures - and insight is not necessarily the same as solace. Think, for example, of Stevenson's Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde, or of English poet Jamie McKendrick's excellent and prescient poem punningly titled 'Et in Orcadia Ego',<sup>9</sup> which begins: 'Having heard the Orkneys were like Eden / we sold up everything and bought a farm.' I cannot be sure if McKendrick is erring intentionally when referring to 'the Orkneys', something no Orcadian would do, just as no Shetlander calls Shetland 'the Shetlands', but I assume so. The poem describes a couple moving north to set up a new, self-sustaining life. Tellingly, the poem makes no allusion to local culture or people, the housing crisis, language erosion, nor to the thing that best defines, sustains, and exemplifies Scottish island life: community. An island is not a static piece of land surrounded by water: rather, because time exists, an island is a boat. A small island is a lifeboat. That the people onboard are in some degree of harmony is as good as essential. In the post-pandemic, post-Brexit, currently cost-of-living-impaired islands of Scotland, television celebrities are 'discovering' us, AirBnB greed is making people homeless and pricing locals out of the island where they grew up and would prefer to stay. These social problems have visited upon many people from all backgrounds unprecedented levels and types of stress. Meanwhile, the intrepid protagonist of McKendrick's poem sets up a goat-breeding project, which fails. The poem ends memorably:

*The farm pony was looking darkly innocent
and the kid had withdrawn into his yellow gaze
- the colour made me think of Nile mud -
his jaw stove in by the pony's hoof.
All attempts to heal or tend him failed
and, though neither I nor Anne could keep it down,
we ended eating our last chance to stay.*

The compulsion to move to a Scottish island and contort it into an impossible pipe-dream is an entitled kind of denial, and is sad on many levels. The Scottish islands could be immeasurably uplifted by an influx of diverse peoples, bringing with them disparate cultural influences, skills, and ideas. Incomers enrich the heritage, become part of the ongoing narrative, cultivate and are cultivated by the social synergies around them. What I am interested in is a certain mindset that drives people to attempt to live in a place that is unhelpfully - perhaps damagingly - removed from reality. In McKendrick's poem the monolithic, self-centred 'Main Character Syndrome' ego-dream, by definition unfulfillable, is the pitiful catalyst which tends to set certain heroic adventurers stumbling forth into the 'wild', 'remote', island 'wilderness', usually dragging with them a spouse, and an attitude that is at variance with the prevailing shared values of the culture.

The situation is complicated; a resentment, evident on social media pages, is simmering between locals and some who choose to move to the islands, the former perceiving that the latter are pushing property prices up to levels that are unattainable for many indigenous working folk. A popular meme makes a four-panel cartoon narrative out of the situation. In the first panel a young woman points to a house on a property website and says, 'I fell in love with Harris during my three-day trip, decided I wanted to live there forever, so I bought this.' The next panel is captioned 'three months later' and shows her looking somewhat distraught, grumbling, 'But the wind and the rain!' In the third panel, captioned 'six months later' she is smiling again, stating: 'Decided to rent it out as a luxury holiday home, add a hot tub, and charge five grand a week.' The final panel, captioned 'twelve months later', shows her once again appearing troubled as she complains, 'I can't believe it... There are no locals left to do changeovers.' It is painfully funny. According to other people who see the Hebrides as a money-making opportunity, the islands are apparently 'lost' (despite their being 'discovered' multiple times, not least during pandemic times). There is talk of bringing 'reality tv' programme 'Castaway' back, so perhaps Taransay is about to be discovered. Again. Never mind that scores of people lived quite sustainably on the 'remote' island of Taransay before television apparently invented it. The island has been repurposed and will be useful for as long as those who exploit it can make money from it.

My contentions are: that civilised society requires a balance of emic perspectives and etic ones; that the Scottish islands deserve a much better equilibrium in this regard; that active effort is required to negotiate this re-balancing (and so, because creative writing is my vocation, I include literature in this endeavour). It need hardly be mentioned that there is nothing remote about any Scottish island to those who abide there. 'Getting away from it all' implies that the islands are not part of everything else, a form of othering (impossible, incidentally, in an interdependent world), while 'getting away from people' suggests that islanders are not people. Indeed, some people, authors included, have treated islanders as a very inferior type of person. We islanders, however, are people - 'real people in a real place', as Iain Crichton Smith put it.<sup>10</sup> He wrote eloquently about one of the most painful and deep-rooted and inordinately difficult challenges of being a writer from the islands: we simply do not set out on an equal footing. What Smith maintained was true for me (working-class islander, born to islander parents and grandparents, etc) and for many other writers like me (marginalised, disempowered). We who grew up belittled, misrepresented, erased, have little experience of agency; our understanding of power is generally imbued with a sense of 'power is what other people have' and 'we have no voice' in a country that, for example, routinely expresses anti-Gaelic sentiment when Gaelic's existence is acknowledged at all. We can resolve to work hard to make progress, to assert ourselves as people who have a right to exist and to be in appreciable alignment with our own heritage, our own languages.

During my visit home, I went to Museum is Tasglann nan Eilean, the local museum in Stornoway, which is generally excellent - lucid, informative, compellingly designed. The permanent exhibition does quote some poets - I noticed only male ones are represented however, and this recalled an experience I had once when I was doing a reading tour of Ireland. A renowned poet showed me around his local museum. The exhibition had a decent focus on the arts, principally music but also literature. 'Did you notice anything about that museum?' the writer asked me afterwards. 'Yes,' I said. 'It doesn't mention you. Doesn't so much as acknowledge your existence.' He smiled ruefully and nodded, without needing to explain why he, a gay man, the most famous living poet in the area, was not represented in his local museum while other living artists were.

Was the museum representing an area or representing a distorted and dishonest (more fictional than fiction) version of an area? Although that poet's work was not 'allowed' into the museum's narrative, his writing is nonetheless received with acclaim in the wider world, and the area where he is based exists proudly in his poetry; indeed, his landscape thus becomes a living element in the mind of his readers around the world. The relationship between poet and 'official' local perception in that sort of situation might not exactly seem a reciprocal arrangement, but it is one that cultural curators can surely work to change, because really this is about balance, fairness, and the just recognition of voices that are often quieter not because of lesser talent but because of - to give just a few examples - being part of a minority (or a minority within a minority), possessing a greater innate humility, living out the sore consequences of being ground down by the iniquities of 'othering', and so on.

One wall of the museum in Stornoway is devoted not to a rich piece of Gaelic poetry or an excerpt from one of the island's prominent writers (Anna Frater or Murchadh MacPhàrlain, say) but rather to an inelegant and banal quotation about the weather from Peter May, which reads in its entirety, ellipsis and all: '...where the weather has so dominated daily life. Not because of any extremes of temperature... but because of its changeability.'<sup>11</sup>

It is strangely impossible to discuss the islands' cultural inheritance without mentioning something that is naturally and thankfully alien to them: murder. Malachy Tallack is just one writer from Shetland who takes umbrage. Writing about the tv series Shetland, based on the Ann Cleeves books, he says:

The show's producers, it seems, have found that sweet spot between scenery and slaughter...For despite seeming to be embedded in the place, the success of Shetland relies ... on a feeling of mystery and menace that only make sense from afar.<sup>12</sup>

Murder is dodo-rare in the Scottish islands, for manifold reasons (from inherently/culturally well-calibrated moral compasses to the logistical difficulties of getting away with murder in a place where, when you step outside the door, your neighbours usually know where you are going before you do). Every place begets its writers and in a principled world the writers who are from that place are allowed for their voices to be heard alongside those who are not from there but have elected to write about it. Indigenous writers are frequently and inexplicably sidelined, as if to render them irrelevant. A memorial bust of Iain Crichton Smith does exist – in Edinburgh.<sup>13</sup> There should also be a memorial to him in Lewis. James Joyce has benefitted Dublin enormously, both in human terms and in relation to the only area some people appreciate: money. In Edinburgh, Waverley Station, as befits its name, is pleasingly suffused with quotations from Walter Scott. Even Irvine Welsh's Trainspotting has spawned everything from guided walks<sup>14</sup> to a forthcoming musical.<sup>15</sup>

I do not shy from the tourist's gaze. Most people are, at some points in their lives, tourists, as I was in Argentina, and after all, '[t]ourism is one of the world's largest industries and the UK's literary heritage draws many visitors here. It is important, both economically and reputationally, for their experience to be a positive and authentic one.'<sup>16</sup> How authenticity is manifested, presented, interpreted, or even adequately defined constitutes a book in itself. But for my part I believe that: literature is important and meaningful; books set in marginalised areas by writers from marginalised areas and by writers not from marginalised areas are equally valid; it seems to be a symptom of marginalisation that the latter are privileged; we can all do something to rectify this.

Meaning and intention are of the essence, even and especially in fiction. When banal nothingnesses and harmful otherings are given public precedence over intelligent and meaningful literary contribution, all of us lose out, because we are sacrificing deep truth in favour of making the trite ostensibly important and the trivial lastingly, and detrimentally, influential, plus we are, unconsciously or otherwise, being taught moreover that this devaluing is okay, acceptable, correct, even while it is specious. Perhaps it seems strange that authenticity can derive from fictions, but as I have sought to illustrate above, this is indeed the case. After all, who we are, both individually and collectively, is inextricably predicated on narrative, and who we are, as novels are uniquely qualified to demonstrate, is fallible, human, vulnerable – and worth protecting. Recently, in my home island of Lewis I spent some life-enhancing time with two writers who were doing novel-related research in the Hebrides, one a Booker Prize winner at the dizzying apex of his career, the other, an American writer earnestly researching her first novel, demonstrating her commitment by starting to learn Gaelic. I am impatient already, hungrily looking forward to both books. During a conversation about how life is changing on these islands, Douglas Stuart, whose debut Shuggie Bain<sup>17</sup> won the Booker and hearts and minds globally, recommended I read The Colony<sup>18</sup> by Irish novelist Audrey Magee. I can see why. As the Financial Times describes it, this terrific book tells ‘a story about language and identity, about art, oppression, freedom and colonialism ... a novel about big, important things.’<sup>19</sup> These timely themes are every bit as pertinent to the Scottish islands as to the Irish.

I contend that a small island is a dramatic crucible, that cultural appreciation and cultural appropriation are nuanced areas, that awareness, intention, and identity form a complicated nexus. In The Colony, an English artist, Mr Lloyd, visits an unnamed Irish island to paint, promising to accede to the islanders’ wishes not to paint them, a promise he swiftly and repeatedly breaks. Meanwhile JP Masson, a French linguist (with an Algerian mother) arrives to continue his studies into Irish, a language he wishes everyone to speak, a language in which the Englishman has no interest. The flowing, stylistically exquisite past-tense chapters that offer the primary narrative are interspersed with sparse, present tense reports on sectarian killings (‘documentary interludes’, the New York Times called them) which are all the more potent for being so resonantly understated. The Colony is at once the most relevant and the most admirable novel I have read all year:

What do you think, Micheál? said Masson. Are you less Irish when you speak English?

I don’t talk politics, Masson. You know that.

We’re talking about language, Micheál.

Same thing.<sup>20</sup>

The last few years have been turbulent, not just in the Celtic lands, but everywhere. Assailed by a daily tsunami of (frequently unbidden) information, besieged in a world of attention-span decimating TikToks, negotiating a headspace that must now attempt to separate human authenticity from queasy AI fakery and plagiarism, many people struggle to make time for engaged reading. The novel itself, I fear, is being devalued in ways that are both active and passive, blatant and insidious. This does all of us a disservice, and by 'all of us' I am including people not yet born, for good literature transcends, even as it elucidates, time.

It was an enriching visit home, giving me the chance to privately as well as publicly honour and explore the achievements of Douglas Stuart, and to enthuse over and discuss the future novel of Jane Ainslie, the American writer. Past, present, future, emic, etic,<sup>21</sup> fictional, actual - all these elements came thrillingly alive in harmonious dialogue, as dedicated authors shared vital truths.

I really believe in fiction. On Monday, 15 May 2017, I found myself sitting on a seat thirty-five thousand feet up in the air, barrelling through the sky on a flight to Buenos Aires, overworked and grateful for the opportunity to travel to a new country. I had never been there, yet Argentina was not really new to me, for a specific form of mind-to-mind transmission, reading, had established an Argentina within me already. In particular, the works of Jorge Luis Borges had created in my mind a complex and captivating land, one that simultaneously owed much to global literature, Borges being surely one of the most well-read writers of his or any other day. He had a great love of Scottish literature and proclaimed frequently that he considered Robert Louis Stevenson a personal friend, no matter that Stevenson died before Borges was born. One of the sincere marvels of literature, then, is that it proves friendship, travel, and time alike exist in ways that outshine their mundane definitions; literature bestows upon the engaged reader further dimensions.

I was flying over a pre-pandemic world to Argentina to explore the capital city Buenos Aires and a mountain in Capilla del Monte, Cerro Uritorco, about which I had heard some strange and compelling things. Great busyness meant I was apparently unprepared, for I was reading two books on the plane that I ought to have read and absorbed before then. One was a book of short stories, Things We Lost in the Fire, by Mariana Enriquez, and the other was a guidebook to Argentina. These books were quite different - ostensibly, one was fiction and the other factual. Even their covers were polar opposites, with one being dark and Gothic, while the other was white and clinical. I was going to be spending time with Mariana Enriquez as part of the Outriders initiative,<sup>22</sup> a project that inherently demonstrates the value of both emic and etic perspectives. I would be living for a few weeks in a country that was theoretically unfamiliar to me. By the time the plane touched down in a country whose sky resembled its own flag, as Scotland's sometimes does, I had gained a broad and solid insight into Argentina - her culture, her outlook, her modus vivendi. But I had gleaned these understandings from the work of fiction. The non-fiction book, the guidebook, by contrast offered a heavily sanitised, even idealised, version of Argentina, replete with glossy photographs and adjectives that performed the verbal equivalent of airbrushing. Between Borges and Enriquez, I had a fair grasp of where I would be spending the next few weeks. This I took as further proof of my belief that - to amend something Picasso said about visual art - 'Fictions are lies that reveal bigger truths'.

Writers are often fortunate enough to be invited to visit other countries, to experience other cultures, to share words, hopes, ideas. Some writing residencies stipulate that the author write something specifically in response to the place where they are staying. In other words, I wish to make it clear that etic impressions, opinions, and understandings about a place are nothing less than vital. Emic perspectives deserve equal prominence, since the place, its culture, and its language(s) are organically embedded in the way indigenous writers think. Emic and etic perspectives work best when they are in dialogue, i.e. when both are given fair space to express themselves, in which case they balance and strengthen each other.

Fiction enhances life-as-lived. One islander who seldom felt the need to escape his steadfast rock is George Mackay Brown. The first time I visited Orkney I was thrilled to note that the ferry I took to Stromness made allusions to his work; quotations from his poems and stories brightened - deepened would be a better word - the décor. When I disembarked and set foot on this island that I had visited so many times in George Mackay Brown's writing, I felt as though I were walking through one GMB poem and story after another. It was a giddy, entrancing experience, like meeting a relative who died before you were born and finding them to be every bit as enticing as you had hoped. 'Books permit us to voyage through time,' said Carl Sagan.<sup>23</sup> It is true. The first-time visitor to a place benefits mightily from a palimpsest view if they have the good fortune to be a dedicated reader. Mind you, it will naturally depend on what they have been reading, how nutritious and edifying the mental nourishment. A guidebook might list the ingredients, a worthwhile novel will provide the taste.

This emphasises how crucial it is that the curators of our cultural heritage pay close attention to emic and etic perspectives, both. Vicarious experience is a phrase that most people interpret with stress on the first word, but I wish to highlight the fact that vicarious experience is also still a form of experience. Neuroscientists are demonstrating, to no reader's or writer's surprise, that 'reading action-related words also prompts our bodies to physically mimic the actions we are reading about'.<sup>24</sup> Authors sometimes talk about 'method writing' (imaginatively embodying the experience being described while setting the words down) and readers will often report being truly engrossed in a narrative as if it is really happening, the result of immersive, evocative authorial skills and attentive reading. All of which implies that literature and literary tourism could play a more genuinely meaningful role in how we portray our cultural identity to others and to ourselves.

The literature that lasts offers us insight - this is partly why it endures - and insight is not necessarily the same as solace. Think, for example, of Stevenson's Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde, or of English poet Jamie McKendrick's excellent and prescient poem punningly titled 'Et in Orcadia Ego',<sup>25</sup> which begins: 'Having heard the Orkneys were like Eden / we sold up everything and bought a farm.' I cannot be sure if McKendrick is erring intentionally when referring to 'the Orkneys', something no Orcadian would do, just as no Shetlander calls Shetland 'the Shetlands', but I assume so. The poem describes a couple moving north to set up a new, self-sustaining life. Tellingly, the poem makes no allusion to local culture or people, the housing crisis, language erosion, nor to the thing that best defines, sustains, and exemplifies Scottish island life: community. An island is not a static piece of land surrounded by water: rather, because time exists, an island is a boat. A small island is a lifeboat. That the people onboard are in some degree of harmony is as good as essential. In the post-pandemic, post-Brexit, currently cost-of-living-impaired islands of Scotland, television celebrities are 'discovering' us, AirBnB greed is making people homeless and pricing locals out of the island where they grew up and would prefer to stay. These social problems have visited upon many people from all backgrounds unprecedented levels and types of stress. Meanwhile, the intrepid protagonist of McKendrick's poem sets up a goat-breeding project, which fails. The poem ends memorably:

*The farm pony was looking darkly innocent
and the kid had withdrawn into his yellow gaze
- the colour made me think of Nile mud -
his jaw stove in by the pony's hoof.
All attempts to heal or tend him failed
and, though neither I nor Anne could keep it down,
we ended eating our last chance to stay.*

The compulsion to move to a Scottish island and contort it into an impossible pipe-dream is an entitled kind of denial, and is sad on many levels. The Scottish islands could be immeasurably uplifted by an influx of diverse peoples, bringing with them disparate cultural influences, skills, and ideas. Incomers enrich the heritage, become part of the ongoing narrative, cultivate and are cultivated by the social synergies around them. What I am interested in is a certain mindset that drives people to attempt to live in a place that is unhelpfully - perhaps damagingly - removed from reality. In McKendrick's poem the monolithic, self-centred 'Main Character Syndrome' ego-dream, by definition unfulfillable, is the pitiful catalyst which tends to set certain heroic adventurers stumbling forth into the 'wild', 'remote', island 'wilderness', usually dragging with them a spouse, and an attitude that is at variance with the prevailing shared values of the culture.

The situation is complicated; a resentment, evident on social media pages, is simmering between locals and some who choose to move to the islands, the former perceiving that the latter are pushing property prices up to levels that are unattainable for many indigenous working folk. A popular meme makes a four-panel cartoon narrative out of the situation. In the first panel a young woman points to a house on a property website and says, 'I fell in love with Harris during my three-day trip, decided I wanted to live there forever, so I bought this.' The next panel is captioned 'three months later' and shows her looking somewhat distraught, grumbling, 'But the wind and the rain!' In the third panel, captioned

'six months later' she is smiling again, stating: 'Decided to rent it out as a luxury holiday home, add a hot tub, and charge five grand a week.' The final panel, captioned 'twelve months later', shows her once again appearing troubled as she complains, 'I can't believe it... There are no locals left to do changeovers.' It is painfully funny. According to other people who see the Hebrides as a money-making opportunity, the islands are apparently 'lost' (despite their being 'discovered' multiple times, not least during pandemic times). There is talk of bringing 'reality tv' programme 'Castaway' back, so perhaps Taransay is about to be discovered. Again. Never mind that scores of people lived quite sustainably on the 'remote' island of Taransay before television apparently invented it. The island has been repurposed and will be useful for as long as those who exploit it can make money from it.

My contentions are: that civilised society requires a balance of emic perspectives and etic ones; that the Scottish islands deserve a much better equilibrium in this regard; that active effort is required to negotiate this re-balancing (and so, because creative writing is my vocation, I include literature in this endeavour). It need hardly be mentioned that there is nothing remote about any Scottish island to those who abide there. 'Getting away from it all' implies that the islands are not part of everything else, a form of othering (impossible, incidentally, in an interdependent world), while 'getting away from people' suggests that islanders are not people. Indeed, some people, authors included, have treated islanders as a very inferior type of person. We islanders, however, are people - 'real people in a real place', as Iain Crichton Smith put it.<sup>26</sup> He wrote eloquently about one of the most painful and deep-rooted and inordinately difficult challenges of being a writer from the islands: we simply do not set out on an equal footing. What Smith maintained was true for me (working-class islander, born to islander parents and grandparents, etc) and for many other writers like me (marginalised, disempowered). We who grew up belittled, misrepresented, erased, have little experience of agency; our understanding of power is generally imbued with a sense of 'power is what other people have' and 'we have no voice' in a country that, for example, routinely expresses anti-Gaelic sentiment when Gaelic's existence is acknowledged at all. We can resolve to work hard to make progress, to assert ourselves as people who have a right to exist and to be in appreciable alignment with our own heritage, our own languages.

During my visit home, I went to Museum is Tasglann nan Eilean, the local museum in Stornoway, which is generally excellent - lucid, informative, compellingly designed. The permanent exhibition does quote some poets - I noticed only male ones are represented however, and this recalled an experience I had once when I was doing a reading tour of Ireland. A renowned poet showed me around his local museum. The exhibition had a decent focus on the arts, principally music but also literature. 'Did you notice anything about that museum?' the writer asked me afterwards. 'Yes,' I said. 'It doesn't mention you. Doesn't so much as acknowledge your existence.' He smiled ruefully and nodded, without needing to explain why he, a gay man, the most famous living poet in the area, was not represented in his local museum while other living artists were.

Was the museum representing an area or representing a distorted and dishonest (more fictional than fiction) version of an area? Although that poet's work was not 'allowed' into the museum's narrative, his writing is nonetheless received with acclaim in the wider world, and the area where he is based exists proudly in his poetry; indeed, his landscape thus becomes a living element in the mind of his readers around the world. The relationship between poet and 'official' local perception in that sort of situation might not exactly seem a reciprocal arrangement, but it is one that cultural curators can surely work to change, because really this is about balance, fairness, and the just recognition of voices that are often quieter not because of lesser talent but because of - to give just a few examples - being part of a minority (or a minority within a minority), possessing a greater innate humility, living out the sore consequences of being ground down by the iniquities of 'othering', and so on.

One wall of the museum in Stornoway is devoted not to a rich piece of Gaelic poetry or an excerpt from one of the island's prominent writers (Anna Frater or Murchadh MacPhàrlain, say) but rather to an inelegant and banal quotation about the weather from Peter May, which reads in its entirety, ellipsis and all: '...where the weather has so dominated daily life. Not because of any extremes of temperature... but because of its changeability.'<sup>27</sup>

It is strangely impossible to discuss the islands' cultural inheritance without mentioning something that is naturally and thankfully alien to them: murder. Malachy Tallack is just one writer from Shetland who takes umbrage. Writing about the tv series Shetland, based on the Ann Cleeves books, he says:

The show's producers, it seems, have found that sweet spot between scenery and slaughter...For despite seeming to be embedded in the place, the success of Shetland relies ... on a feeling of mystery and menace that only make sense from afar.<sup>28</sup>

Murder is dodo-rare in the Scottish islands, for manifold reasons (from inherently/culturally well-calibrated moral compasses to the logistical difficulties of getting away with murder in a place where, when you step outside the door, your neighbours usually know where you are going before you do). Every place begets its writers and in a principled world the writers who are from that place are allowed for their voices to be heard alongside those who are not from there but have elected to write about it. Indigenous writers are frequently and inexplicably sidelined, as if to render them irrelevant. A memorial bust of Iain Crichton Smith does exist - in Edinburgh.<sup>29</sup> There should also be a memorial to him in Lewis. James Joyce has benefitted Dublin enormously, both in human terms and in relation to the only area some people appreciate: money. In Edinburgh, Waverley Station, as befits its name, is pleasingly suffused with quotations from Walter Scott. Even Irvine Welsh's Trainspotting has spawned everything from guided walks<sup>30</sup> to a forthcoming musical.<sup>31</sup>

I do not shy from the tourist's gaze. Most people are, at some points in their lives, tourists, as I was in Argentina, and after all, '[t]ourism is one of the world's largest industries and the UK's literary heritage draws many visitors here. It is important, both economically and reputationally, for their experience to be a positive and authentic one.'<sup>32</sup> How authenticity is manifested, presented, interpreted, or even adequately defined constitutes a book in itself. But for my part I believe that: literature is important and meaningful; books set in marginalised areas by writers from marginalised areas and by writers not from marginalised areas are equally valid; it seems to be a symptom of marginalisation that the latter are privileged; we can all do something to rectify this.

Meaning and intention are of the essence, even and especially in fiction. When banal nothingnesses and harmful otherings are given public precedence over intelligent and meaningful literary contribution, all of us lose out, because we are sacrificing deep truth in favour of making the trite ostensibly important and the trivial lastingly, and detrimentally, influential, plus we are, unconsciously or otherwise, being taught moreover that this devaluing is okay, acceptable, correct, even while it is specious. Perhaps it seems strange that authenticity can derive from fictions, but as I have sought to illustrate above, this is indeed the case. After all, who we are, both individually and collectively, is inextricably predicated on narrative, and who we are, as novels are uniquely qualified to demonstrate, is fallible, human, vulnerable - and worth protecting.

---

(c) The Bottle Imp